About the work:

Hilary Jack is a prolific yet diverse artist who, since graduating from Manchester Metropolitan University, has established herself as one of the North West's leading artists and has been a central figure in establishing the now thriving art scene in Manchester.

Her work addresses issues surrounding value, authorship and the recycling of art histories and contributes to current debates surrounding painting as an expanded practice. The death of painting has been obsessively proclaimed throughout the history of modern art and in this new series of work Hilary pushes the boundaries of painting to an extreme point of tension, going beyond the normal confines of painting towards its near destruction.

Subjecting her canvasses to various industrial and manual recycling processes her work is simultaneously destroyed and metamorphosed; moving off the canvas stretcher towards the three-dimensional, confounding typical conceptions of painting.

The resulting hybrid works span painting, drawing, site specific installation and video, focusing on painting as the main protagonist and are both an extermination and celebration of her chosen medium.
